Wider First Aid knowledge in the public would also create a wider knowledge of accident causes, processes, and effects which could be a valuable stimulator to effective action and a concerted public will strive to eradicate the present carnage of people who need not die.

There is much to be learned through careful research in preventing accidents. The evidence we cannot rely on, the "insight" of pundits and politicians and the peace-meal result. It will take an informed public to appreciate this need and both to encourage and insist upon effective action.

If in society, we collectively and individually accept the obligation to help someone who is hurt, we will see how necessary it is to engineer hazards out of existence, to teach and to use safe ways, and to really what few rules are then needed. With all that blood in the streets - we must act.
